October 20th 2021: Research + Impact: Diverse Experiences with Breast Cancer

Tune in

Wednesday at 9 AM Pacific
Time on VoiceAmerica Health and Wellness Channel

Dr. Rachel Grob and her team interviewed 40 people from across the United States about their experiences with breast cancer, their interactions with healthcare, and how cancer is impacting their daily lives, identities, relationships, and much more. They then developed a resource to help share these stories. Today's show dives into the research Rachel and her team are doing, what they heard from people about their experiences with breast cancer, and how the web-based resource they created can be useful for people with breast cancer, their family and friends, and other audiences. My understanding that good health matters a lot for human well-being began with a childhood injury, and has been deepening ever since. My work at the Center for Patient Partnerships is about improving health by listening to people's experiences with health and health care. We do this by synthesizing what we hear from many different sources, and then using this powerful learning as a source for making concrete changes that benefit consumers, families and communities. Besides directing national initiatives at the Center for Patient Partnerships, I have roles at the university in the Department of Family Medicine and Community Health and the Health Innovation Program. I also chair a national
