January 24th 2013: Latin America: will growth continue or is it doomed to repeat a commodities boom-bust cycle?

Since 2003, Latin America has grown at an enviable pace, in large part due to historically high natural resource prices, including foodstuffs, precious metals, and energy. But commodity prices notoriously fall, often faster than they rise. So how sustainable are Latin America's emerging market levels of growth? My guest is John Price, Managing Director of Americas Market Intelligence, a 20 year veteran of consulting in the region and co-editor of "Can Latin America Compete?" (2007). He'll explore why LatAm has done so well and whether it can continue to grow at 4-5% p.a. Which countries are co
