July 18th 2013: Saving Planet Earth with Nature's Voice featuring Jaco and Serena Vienings

Jaco and Serena Vienings talk with Rob about their ambitious enterprise to save the natural world by producing Nature's Voice. Jaco and Serena travel to remote shores of Hawaii and glaciers in Alaska to present two compelling videos. The first video they titled: Plastic for dinner? Explore with Jaco the biggest dump site on our planet in the ocean, a trash pile bigger than Texas. Their second video is "Who brought the sunscreen?" To answer how does global warming work; we go to Alaska to explore energy, deforestation, polar amplification, permafrost, and blowing up mountains. Jaco tells how

Featured Guests

Jaco Vienings

Jaco Vienings hails from South Africa. He is an energetic, fun and lively host, working his way up in the broadcasting world. Jaco's newest project is a video series called "Nature's Voice". Nature's Voice is co-produced by Serena Vienings. Jaco writes: Loving the outdoors, science and working with my hands, I graduated with a double major in Viticulture and Oenology at the University of Stellenbosch in South Africa. I next decided to travel the world using my University skills to work and also explore 15 other countries. Seeing the unique beauty in all of them, I felt the need to share this passion I had for the environment. I decided to devote my time to a career in broadcasting, focusing

Serena Vienings

Serena Vienings is from Ohio. Serena was on location in Fiddletown, CA doing costume design for a crew shooting a short western film when out stepped Jaco. You can hear Serena describe what followed and how they ended up together. Serena handles the video camera and much of the logistics, as well as coaching Jaco before the camera. Clearly, based on Nature's Vision videos, Serena is very good. She is producing a second series of a few shows that have already been filmed and is planning future trips and videos in Peru.
