June 3rd 2016: Going from IT leader to Grease Guy to Biodiesel Entrepreneur

After a successful 25 year run in the IT industry, Mr. Dobson decided to turn a hobby into a new career. While working, he began collecting used fryer oil after work from a local restaurant and made biodiesel at home to fuel his vehicles. Intrigued by the business side of biodiesel and the staggering number of businesses that were short-lived, he decided to research the cause of so many failures. The results pointed to a lack of maturity in the fledgling industry and failure of most to have an integrated business model. In 2011, with fuel prices rising he decided to take the leap and started A

Walter Dobson

Walter Dobson is a seasoned business leader with a background in Information Technology. His previous role was the Chief Information Officer (CIO) & Senior Vice-President of Associa, the world's largest Property Owners Association Management Company. He's now the CEO and founder of American Bio Source, LLC., a grease recycling company based in Denton, Texas. Founded in early 2011, it has maintained a focus on bringing its oil to the biofuels market. In early 2005, he took on two personal projects that have led him to creating Denton Bio Fuels, LLC. First, he built and flew his own helicopter.
